Beast Herds

Long ago, certain hooved and ruminant creatures – sheep, cattle, deer and others – learned to walk on two legs, developing humanoid bodies and a unique form of intelligence while retaining their horned animal heads. Defying easy categorisation, these tribes have been feared and rejected by other sapient species, who call them beasts, even as their culture has become equally complex and their ability to wage war equally potent. Whether because of this treatment or their own nature, the herds have long embraced the wild places, fostering an ancient migratory culture that others ignorantly call primitive. Living in great numbers all around the world, beast herds are the antithesis of sedentary nations: lovers of primal emotions and all things untamed, scornful of political borders. They're rightly feared, for they are savage in battle, and have no qualms about taking from those too weak to stop them.

Most Beast Herds follow migratory routes on a seasonal basis, following paths only they know – no matter who tries to stop them.

In the dank morass of the Bog of Beasts, some Beast Herds find permanent homes for their Hiddenherds, and others find a year-round stopping point on their migrations.

Hidden Herds and Warherds

The herds' nomadic society is centred around a single key division. Fighting beasts gather in roving warherds that seek out food and material wealth, using violence if necessary. Meanwhile, children, females and the sick or wounded constitute the larger hidden herds, which keep to a single secluded area, though they still undertake regular migrations that can sometimes span entire continents. They are led by matriarchs and guided by wizards known as soothsayers. Constantly raiding, warherds are often feared and hunted by other species. Some can be hired as mercenaries, or bought off with goods they cannot themselves produce, like bread and beer. When desperate, they can split into smaller bands to evade and consolidate. Conversely, when small groups become willing or strong enough, they can combine with others, causing herds to occasionally cascade in size. The local chiefs will fight to determine the collective new leader. Protecting the hidden herds is the warherds' most essential duty. Should the hidden herds be harmed in any way, the perpetrators will face exceedingly wrathful vengeance.

Womb Marking

The most secret heart of the herds is the practice of womb marking. Using ancient spells known only to themselves, beast mages are able to guide the development of infants during pregnancy. Though the sacred rituals of this practice have improved over the millennia, they remain risky and can often fail, resulting in stillbirths and horrors. Still, marking is considered an essential part of life and a truly mighty weapon to boot. It not only ensures the continuation of the species despite its unnatural origins, but also allows the herds to improve themselves and foster a radical variety of forms and creatures. It has enhanced natural advantages, such as excellent hearing, smell, mobility and pain tolerance, while overcoming certain characteristics like the lack of hands. In rare cases, it has even produced vocal chords able to speak foreign languages, facilitating communication with other species. Both the herds and their enemies recognise the breathtaking potential of what womb marking has produced: specialised cavalry, fliers and even spectacular colossi.

Tales and Beliefs

The beast herds do not worship gods; instead, they believe that immortality comes from having your story told after your death. Every beast knows many songs and tales from their own tribe and others. Bards and storytellers are afforded great standing in the tribe, and even the chiefs allow them to touch their horns, a sign of great respect. For captives, simply knowing the name of a local hero is sometimes enough to gain mercy from a normally ruthless tribe – it's common practice to intentionally leave survivors in order for a warherd's fame to spread. Bone fetishes are often used as tokens of great heroes. The horns or hooves of the very greatest are sometimes kept and bound to minor supernals by soothsayers to create totems of magical power. Beasts also respect the legends of other cultures, burning down a temple or palace but leaving offerings before a hero's statue outside. Most beasts believe their spirit survives until their story is told for the last time. Though tales of battle are common, fame can also be won from cunning, merriment, artistic or crafting skill, and many other attributes.

Organisation

The herds have no central authority, and never seek to rule territory, though their migrations can be of such huge scale that they bring herds together in terrifying numbers, becoming a de facto regional authority for a time. They do also sometimes gather for inter-tribal councils, most famously at the start of the Ninth Age, when tribes freed from Vermin domination established the first and only law of the beasts, namely: No Masters. Herd economy primarily centres on the need for a high-calorie diet; raiding, tribute and payment for attacking other targets are the most common sources. Technological ability varies greatly from tribe to tribe, but most are capable of forging metal weapons and constructing wheeled vehicles.

Army Model Rules

Drunkard

The unit gains one of two sets of effects depending on whether it shows up Sober or Drunk on the Battlefield. During Pre-game Selections, each unit containing Drunkard must choose whether it is Sober or Drunk. Drunk Characters cannot join units containing any Sober models and vice versa (models without Drunkard are considered neither Drunk nor Sober).

Sober

The model gains Light Troops and Vanguard.
A unit that has been Sober at any point during the game is never considered Scoring.

Drunk

The model gains Fearless, Unruly and Devastating Charge (+1 Str, +1 AP).
Drunk units cannot choose to Ambush.

Beer is highly prized as a rich source of energy, and it's often the primary target of a raid. Of course, the beverage has its side effects, making beasts more belligerent and less concerned for their own safety or strategy. For this reason, most avoid intoxicating themselves before battle, but certain beasts inevitably still choose to indulge.

Hunting Call

If the Army List includes a model with Hunting Call, the owner may reroll Ambush rolls of '1' and '2'.
If the owner has the second Player Turn, any unit containing Pack Tactics may choose to roll for its Ambush starting from Player Turn 1.

At one with the wilderness, beasts are canny tacticians, instinctively able to manoeuvre with stealth and exploit the nearby terrain to set traps. The surprise ambush is their preferred method of waging war, and certain chiefs are particularly adept at coordinating their forces.

Looted Booze

One use only. May be activated at the start of any Player Turn.
All models with Drunkard in the model's unit change their state from Sober to Drunk.

Pack Tactics

Charge Range rolls made towards an enemy unit's Flank or Rear Facing are Maximised.

Attack Attributes

Primal Instinct – Special Attack

During Combat Choices, each unit containing this Attack Attribute must take a Courage Test.
If the test is passed, all model parts with Primal Instinct in the unit gain Hatred, with Duration: Round of Combat.

Weapons

Beast Axe – Melee Weapon

+2 Def, +1 Str, +1 AP, Agi always 0.

Totems

Totems are upgrades that certain units can take. There are two kinds of Totem upgrades:

Totem Bearers

The unit gains a single Bound Spell chosen from the list below, which must be noted on the Army List.

When casting the spell, choose one Rank-and-File model in the unit as the model casting the spell.

The spell can only target the unit itself.

Greater Totem Bearers

The model gains all four Bound Spells from the list below, with Range 18".

All Totems have a Casting Value of 4+, Type: Augment and Duration: One Turn.

Bound Spell

Gnarled Hide Totem

CV	Type	Duration
4+	Augment	One Turn

Magic Items

Weapon Enchantments

Hawthorne Curse 50 pts

Models without Ambush only.

Enchantment: Hand Weapon.

Devastating Charge (+2 Str, +2 AP).

The weapon can be used as a Shooting Weapon (3+) with the following profile: Range 18", Shots 1, Str 3, AP 10, Area Attack (1×5) and Direct Hit (Str 6, Multiple Wounds (D3)). This Shooting Attack never suffers negative to-hit modifiers.

Ancestral Carvings 45 pts

Uncommon. Soothsayers only.

Enchantment: Hand Weapon.

+2 Att, +2 Str, +2 AP, and Distracting (1).

Fatal Folly 25 pts

Enchantment: Beast Axe.

For each Standard Melee Attack allocated against the wielder's model that results in a to-hit roll of '1', the wielder must perform a Standard Melee Attack at the end of the same Agility Step, before any casualties are removed.

This overrides the normal restriction that Beast Axe attacks always strike at Agility Step 0.

This attack must be allocated towards the model's Health Pool that rolled the '1' to hit, and it does not count against the number of attacks the wielder's model can make due to Restricted Attacks.

Twin Hungers 15 pts

Enchantment: Paired Weapons.

Lethal Strike. Every time a Standard Melee Attack made with this weapon rolls a '6' to wound and causes a HP loss, the wielder may Recover 1 HP at the end of current the Agility Step (unless their model was removed as a casualty).

Only 1 HP can be regained per phase with this item.

Armour Enchantments

Aaghor's Affliction 80 pts

+1 Res, and Regeneration (4+).

The model loses Light Armour and Metal Armour, and automatically fails all its Armour Saves.

Trickster's Cunning Resistance. 55 pts

Wild Form 30 pts

During Combat Choices, the bearer may gain either of the following, with Duration: Round of Combat:

- -1 Res, +1 Str, +1 AP
- +1 Res, -1 Str, -1 AP

Shield Enchantments

Obscuring Fog 15 pts

Afflict (-1 Agi).

Banner Enchantments

Banner of the Wild Herd 70 pts

Potions and Scrolls

Rain Augur Brew 45 pts

One use only. Duration: One Turn.

If the bearer is on the Battlefield, this item is automatically activated at the start of the first Game Turn; if not, it has no effect.

All Ranged Attacks suffer -1 to hit.

Seed of the Dark Forest 40 pts

One use only. Duration: Permanent.

During Pre-game Selections, place a Forest:

- Touching your Deployment Zone.
- Not in contact with any Terrain Feature .

This Forest is a 10"×6" rectangle, that can not be chosen for Primary or Secondary Objectives.

Friendly units entirely with Pack Tactics treat this Forest as part of their Deployment Zone for the purpose of where they can be Deployed.

Warherds are normally led by the mightiest warriors or those whose legend has grown the greatest. Known for savage cunning, they scorn convoluted stratagems, preferring instead to trust on instinct. Able to walk the paths of both warherd and hidden herd, those who can master the primal magecraft of the beasts act as storytellers, guides, and womb markers, shaping the herds' destiny. The greatest warriors typically have the most impressive horns, and those granted the rank of Longhorn also carry the best arms and armour that the herd can provide. They are fiercely loyal, often forming a private wartribe for their leader, and in his name they break any army that stands in the herd's path.

An ancient womb marking descended from the most ill-tempered cattle, minotaurs remain quick to anger when threatened or opposed. Their strength and size make them ideal shock troops, and they're often found in the warherd's vanguard, leading the charge and gorging themselves on the bloodied corpses of their fallen adversaries.

Markings based on horses have never fully succeeded, but have produced a fused creature that can act as powerful cavalry. Imperfect birthing sorceries leave most centaurs suffering from chronic headaches that can only be remedied by prodigious quantities of alcohol. Rash and impulsive, their common inebriation both contributes to and detracts from their ability to wage war.

For the nomadic beast herds, wagons and other wheeled vehicles can be an indispensable mode of transportation for both beasts and their baggage. These constructs can be modified for battle, drawn by truculent beasts of burden and used to devastating effect in times of war.

Oversized boars with serrated tusks, these colossal porcine beasts are the product of womb marking that has enhanced size and territorial instincts, though it's yet to produce intelligence or a bipedal stature. The magic arts of womb marking are dangerous, and failures are common. In rare cases, severely mutated offspring can survive, deformed beyond recognition. Normally condemned to a benevolent exile, they're allowed to follow the herd if they stay out of sight. Such concealed monsters can be a great aid in battle, especially since their warped minds do not know fear – only loneliness.

The rarest and riskiest womb markings are the titan beasts: behemothic brutes sometimes as large as an adult giant. Of these, the cyclops are wisest and most insightful. Their enchanted eye perceives much and can see far – both literally and metaphorically, so it's said. Their calm demeanour and mighty throwing arms are invaluable when the herd needs to overcome fortified holdfasts.

A gortach is the result of ambitious and perilous womb-marking rituals involving large conclaves of soothsayers, intended to produce the ultimate war-beast as a protector for the herd. These horned, many-limbed giants can tear down walls and decimate infantry formations with frightening ease. In battle, they gorge themselves on their fallen foes, gaining strength from their lifeblood.

Whenever a herd finds the unattended nest of a griffon or hippogriff, the soothsayers mark the stolen eggs, attempting to create a jabberwock. These mutant avian enormities have a sense of wrongness about them, as if their very existence is an affront to nature. On the battlefield, their clucking, screeching descent can rout even the most resolute of warriors.
