Orcs and Goblins

Two very different but closely related species, orcs and goblins are creatures highly in tune with the natural world, as well as their own boisterous instincts and unbridled emotions. Sharing a love of mayhem, together they are aptly known as the Warborn. Joining battle with glee, their lives are often short and violent, though they display rich cultures, customs, and religious beliefs. Breeding rapidly, they can appear suddenly in great numbers anywhere in the world, making them greatly feared invasive forces, willing to fight any and all opponents. They attract a variety of strange and powerful creatures as pets – so their armies are always a sight to behold and a force to be reckoned with.

Most major nations have curtailed Warborn populations within their borders, but none have succeeded in eliminating them entirely. The greatest orc hordes can be found in the wild places, endlessly roaming, looking for the next big fight. Goblins live in cities or camps known as Gardens, often kept hidden and secret, and sometimes even moving entirely.

Nomads and Garden Dwellers

The large, burly orcs are nomads, perpetually seeking the next fight, never staying in the same place for long. With an innate love of brawling, they're constantly on the move in tribes of varying sizes, rapidly exhausting nearby sources of food by hunting and plundering. The smaller, wiry goblins, less comfortable being so exposed to the world, instead create "Gardens" to live in for their own protection. These are hidden settlements filled with great numbers and varieties of growing plants, many with medicinal, psychotropic or poisonous properties. Sharing a single biological, cultural and instinctive heritage, the two species naturally form a close symbiosis across the world. Orcs typically contribute strength and protection, while goblins provide cunning, logistics and strategy, and can use vast spy networks to point Warborn armies in the most productive directions. Sedentary goblin Gardens rely on passing orc tribes as a complex mobile perimeter, while in turn providing a measure of protection for orc breeding pits in their territory. They often form closely integrated war parties, but are equally happy to fight separately when needed.

Religion

The Warborn revere a single "principle" of nature called Wapaka by the orcs and Goga by the goblins. This force is felt within, or symbolised by the breeding pit, certain animals, and the moon: the sneering full moon for orcs, the smiling crescent moon for goblins. Wapaka is understood as a spirit of natural violence and the essence of orcishness. Goga is the goblinish principle of truth, cunning, survival, and the all-natural drugs ("divine substances") that embody these qualities. Both Wapaka and Goga are embodied by separate pantheons of gods, such as the orcs' Tazrek, god of the chieftainship; and the goblins' prime deity Karuka, twin god of deception and death. Despite the many gods, there are no Warborn churches in the familiar sense, though orc shamans and goblin sects do take a somewhat spiritual role.

Orc Broods

Both orcs and goblins breed by laying eggs in disgusting pits of meat, often composed of slain enemies – many see this as the true root of their "Warborn" name. These pits are core symbolic and emotional elements of their shared culture. Those hatching from the same pit form close-knit "broods", though occasional stunted individuals known as grotlings form their own associations. Broods are particularly important to orcs, who rarely leave their birth group during the entire course of their lives. When emerging from the pit, often in the midst of the wilderness, newly hatched orcs immediately brawl to establish their brood alpha. They then set off in an attempt to find their parent tribe, following long scent trails. In this immature, "feral" state, they lack cultural and practical development, simply living by their instincts and their great love of fighting. If they are able to integrate with a larger tribe and fight in more battles, broods begin to mature, using more advanced weapons and techniques. The most mature broods often develop impressive craftwork, creating weapons and armour that mark their "iron" status as veterans of countless combats.

Goblin Sects

The Garden cities of the goblins exhibit more complex forms of political and religious institutions. Tribes organise around the different types of flora in the Garden, each led by a demagogue who is theoretically chosen by popular acclaim. Power is built on blatant deception, and lies are the rule of law. Sects are a parallel social structure rooted in rites of initiation into the secrets of plant-lore and Goga. Sect initiates, the gogtuk, are revered for their strange powers. Such mystic botanists are even more obsessed than other goblins with spectacular forms of secrecy and deception, and of course the ultimate project of cheating death itself. The longer a goblin can defy death by surviving great dangers using an arsenal of tricks, cunning schemes, and pharmacology, the more popular they will become. The greatest of all will soon become the sect's leader, called a darrmu: a prophet-like figure who is the most powerful individual in any Garden.

Natural affinity

Both orcs and goblins are instinctively able to form close bonds with wild animals – the more wild, the better. They often make pets of a wide range of unusual species found in their local ecosystem. The larger creatures are sometimes used as mounts for travelling or for battle, and the aggressive ones are herded in droves towards the nearest fighting. Goblins are even capable of taming truly monstrous and gigantic beasts, known as gogyags, using their special Goga formulas. These behemoths are kept in the depths of their Gardens as mighty guardians that they venerate as embodiments of the gods.

Army Specific Rules

War Cry!

One use only.

May be activated at the start of any friendly Player Turn, provided the General is on the Battlefield and not Shaken: apply the following effects, with Duration: One Turn.

- Friendly units gain +1" Charge Speed and +1" Mobility.
- If the General is a Goblin Demagogue or a Goblin Witch, friendly units entirely with Goblin gain Light Troops as long as they are not Engaged in Combat.
- If the General is an Orc Warlord or an Orc Shaman, friendly units entirely with Orc have their Charge Range rolls Maximised.

The Warborn live to fight; the moment when battle is joined is a euphoric rush. In such a state, they will go above and beyond to reach their enemies and give them a good kicking – screaming all the way, of course.

Army Model Rules

Creepy-Crawlies

The model gains Ghost Step, and model parts with Mount gain Poison Attacks.

Darrmu

If the General is a Darrmu, apply the following changes to Army List creation:

- Max. 10% of the Army Points may be spent on units entirely with Orc.
- The Rarity and Duplication Limits 'Max. X items/army' (i.e. 'max. X units/army', 'max. X models/army', and 'max. X per army') in the unit profiles of certain units entirely with Goblin are modified, as indicated by 'D X'.
For example, Uncommon (D Regular) means that if the General is a Darrmu, the Rarity becomes Regular, whereas 'max. 1 (D 2) units/army' means that if the General is a Darrmu, the Duplication Limit becomes 'max. 2 units/army'.

Goblin Cunning

Immediately before taking a Courage Test, that is not automatically passed, any unit consisting entirely of models with Goblin Cunning may choose to fail the Courage Test instead of rolling it.

Headbashers

Legendary.

Units containing Headbashers gain Bodyguard (Tribe Leader), and Rank-and-File model parts with Orc in the unit gain Lethal Strike.

Additionally, units entirely with Headbashers that count towards 'Core' count towards 'Special' instead.

Tribe Leader

If the General is a Tribe Leader, apply the following changes to Army List creation:

- Max. 10% of the Army Points may be spent on units entirely with Goblin.
- The Rarity and Duplication Limits 'Max. X items/army' (i.e. 'max. X units/army', 'max. X models/army', and 'max. X per army') in the unit profiles of certain units entirely with Orc are modified, as indicated by 'TL X'.
For example, Uncommon (TL Regular) means that if the General is a Tribe Leader, the Rarity becomes Regular, whereas 'max. 1 (TL 2) units/army' means that if the General is a Tribe Leader, the Duplication Limit becomes 'max. 2 units/army'.

Unprofessional Courtesy

Each unit can only be chosen up to three times per Player Turn for the Deployment of models with Hidden or Surprise.

Attack Attributes

Brood Rivalry – Melee

The model part gains +1 Att while another friendly unit is Engaged in Combat anywhere on the Battlefield.

Only units containing a Rank-and-File model can benefit from this rule.

Note: when Engaged in Combat, units without a Rank-and-File model still counts as a unit Engaged in Combat for other units.

Orcs are naturally competitive and always seek to prove themselves the greatest fighters – both within their own brood, and also in competition with other broods. This passion for one-upmanship can lead many orcs to ever-greater ferocity in battle.

Crude Weapons – Melee

The model can never benefit from Parry.

After the First Round of Combat, all of the model parts' Melee Weapons count as a Hand Weapon for all rules purposes, with Duration: End of Combat.

Force of Destruction (X) – Melee

Charges cannot be declared against the model with Force of Destruction.

This model is ignored by other units and ignores them for the purpose of Unit Spacing. It may come into contact and move through other units, and other units may come into contact and move through it (excluding Ambush).

When model with Force of Destruction comes into contact with another unit, the other unit immediately suffers X hits with the model's Strength and Armour Penetration, and the model with Force of Destruction is immediately removed as a casualty.

If several units come into contact simultaneously the model with Force of Destruction chooses which unit suffers the hits.

If the model was removed due to another unit moving into contact with it, that unit suffers an additional D6 hits. Health Point losses caused by Force of Destruction in the Charge Phase do not cause Panic Test.

Weapons

Poisoned Spear – Melee Weapon

Spear. Poison Attacks.

Hereditary Spell

Harnessing the fundamental forces of Goga and Wapaka, Warborn wizards are able to impose their natural inclinations on the world around them. Orcs seek to propel themselves to greater feats of battle, while the cunning goblins instinctively attempt to trick and trip their enemies.

The Orcs and Goblins Hereditary Spell is divided into two versions, each of which can only be cast by certain Casters, as specified in the spell description.

Fighting and leading is the same thing to an orc. Brood alphas frequently challenge each other to prove their supremacy; the victor leads the tribe to the next battle. To assert dominance over an entire tribe of born fighters is a task achievable only by the greatest in both raw strength and natural skill.

Orc Horde: The model gains Fearless.

Units entirely with Orc do not cause Panic Test on units entirely with Orc when making Flee Moves through them.

Orcs can never join new broods. The last survivor of a brood will therefore be alone the rest of their lives. Solitary and grim, such warriors are inevitably unsurpassed in combat, covered in scars and battered steel, bristling with every kind of weapon. It's said that eventually such figures will tire of the tribe altogether, departing on a final lonely journey to find their last and greatest battle.

Orc broods are unable to operate without a single leader to bawl the rest into line. Most alphas are determined in the brood's first brawl and, being the strongest and meanest, are never usurped in the many subsequent brawls of the brood's career - unless there's a closely-matched second. Should they die, a new alpha will be established at the earliest opportunity.

Certain rare orcs are marked from the moment they hatch; their brood instinctively treats them as separate, and they innately seek a connection with a greater whole – both the whole tribe, and the whole of the cosmos in the form of Wapaka itself. Learning from other shamans how to form a deeper bond with this primal force, they soon become savage masters of magic.

Goblins naturally revere their populist leaders; most of all, they delight in those who can tell the most brazen lies without being caught. Demagogues lead one or more of a Garden's tribes, and often they lead the (not-so) secret sects as well, making them peerless rabble rousers and the only individuals capable of directing the chaos of a goblin society in a single direction.

Character Mounts

Sturdy and aggressive creatures of orcish stature can be found in every part of the world, though they appear in many shapes and sizes. Hogs of all kinds are popular, though some are only loosely related to porcine creatures. They all share an instinct for wrathful headlong charges that makes them a favourite among orcs.

Not needing mounts that can carry such a weight as a fighting orc, goblins are able to ride a much wider range of animals, from familiar wolves, deer, hyenas, cats, and large rodents to stranger species like giant mongoose, lava goats, vulture-geese and dire skunks – or even decidedly unsettling giant insects, arachnids, amphibians and crustaceans. Less physically strong than orcish mounts, all such creatures are formidable in large numbers.

Taking courage in numbers, goblins attack as a shoving mass of bodies completely untrained in conventional warfare. With ragged arms and armour often derived from organic material, they are known to use the natural toxins of their Garden for extra potency. If their numbers and their poisons fail them, there's always running away; goblins can switch from terror to elation and back again in moments, their whims taking them to and from the fray – sometimes as part of a larger scheme.

If a feral orc brood lives long enough to reach a larger tribe, it will slowly mature into slightly more sedate adults. A plethora of fights have, by this stage, honed the orcs' skills in battle, and they may learn to fashion or steal more advanced weaponry. Grotlings lack strength or cunning, but retain the Warborn's enthusiasm for the fight. Emerging from the pits stunted and weak, they cannot join their birth broods, instead forming adoptive broods with each other, often treasured and protected by the larger Warborn.
